

ISSN : 2395-4132

THE EXPRESSION

An International Multidisciplinary e-Journal

Bimonthly Refereed & Indexed Open Access e-Journal

Impact Factor 3.9

Vol. 6 Issue 5 October 2020

Editor-in-Chief : Dr. Bijender Singh

Email : editor@expressionjournal.com

www.expressionjournal.com

A POSTCOLONIAL STUDY OF SALMAN RUSHDIE'S SELECT NOVELS

Dhruvee Sinha

MA (English)

Patna University, Patna

Bihar, India

.....

Abstract

Salman Rushdie is, possibly, the most political and controversial novelist of the troubled and hard times. The fictions and non-fictions of Rushdie portray accurately the confusing and complex state of postcolonial world. All of the major writings bear the evidence of the interpretation and understanding of the world and the history, and the lasting effect on the life of humanity in general. The tradition of magic realism, ideas of history and criticism and foundational narratives were interpreted in Rushdie's famous novels Midnight's children, Shame and Shalimar the Clown. This paper will investigate in detail about the narration of nation, magic realism and postcolonialism with specific reference to the fictional works of Salman Rushdie. Among numerous fictional works of Salman Rushdie three specific novels namely, Midnight's Children, Shame and Shalimar the Clown have been taken into consideration in this paper.

Keywords

Indian Writing in English, Imagination, Magic Realism, Postcolonialism, Narrative Techniques, Salman Rushdie.

.....

A POSTCOLONIAL STUDY OF SALMAN RUSHDIE'S SELECT NOVELS

Dhruvee Sinha

MA (English)

Patna University, Patna

Bihar, India

.....

Salman Rushdie is an Anglo-Indian writer, often writes about the homeland, Rushdie left from when Rushdie was still a schoolboy. Ahmed Salman Rushdie was born in Bombay, India, on June 19, 1947, to a muslim family. Rushdie was sent to England at the age of fourteen for schooling. Rushdie's family joined with emigrating muslims, responding to the increasing conflicts between Pakistan and India, by moving to Karachi, Pakistan These political and religious conflicts extremely affected Salman Rushdie. Accordingly, Rushdie's homeland was certainly doubled between the subcontinent of India and the British Isles, to where Rushdie had got back again to work in an advertising company before Rushdie began the career as a novelist. Rushdie was inspired by the poem of Sufi "The Conference of the Birds" and published the first novel, namely Grimus, in 1975, but it was ignored by the public and the critics.

The publication of Rushdie's second novel Midnight's Children in 1981 changed the literary fortunes and brought the international acclaim and fame. This novel won the English-Speaking Union Award, an Arts Council Writer's Award and Booker Prize. It was called as the "Booker of Bookers" in 1993 and 2008, accepting and recognizing it as the best work of the Booker Prize in the award history for fiction. Rushdie's third novel, Shame was of Pakistani politics and regarded commonly as a political allegory. Rushdie's latest novel Shalimar the Clown, was published in 2005.

Rushdie's second novel, Midnight's Children (1981) is considered as a panoramic book traversing a period of 70 years in modern history in India. Rushdie was born and brought up in Bombay, a city of multi-culture, which recreates the eclectic and vitality culture of urban India. This novel is a work of 'fiction- faction', by Rushdie who was born in India but settled in a foreign country.

Rushdie made an effort to recreate homeland, blending fantasy and fact, reality and vision, desire and memory, time and timelessness. It is a novel of gestures and signs and cunningness of hand narrated with a passion of explaining rather than illuminating meaning. Of historical fiction writing, many other writers followed Rushdie in such a way. Some writers tried follow Rushdie, whereas other writers encouraged and influenced by the success of Rushdie and tried their hands at various methods and techniques to approach history, thereby generating works which carried the Indian Historical novel to considerable height.

Midnight's Children is considered to be an autobiography. The fiction is about some political events and Indian history during the period of its action. This novel contains most of the important political events between 1947 and 1978; it is not similar to the historical novels done by earlier works of the writers of fictional history as the events in the fiction are not reproduced but merely noted, not explained but merely positioned into the fabric of the account. The epic proportion of 552 page novel glances at the subcontinent of India through the eyes of a man born at the blow of the hour of Indian Independence. Saleem is extremely self-conscious narrator. Saleem is Rushdie's alter ego and an allegorical rendition of the independence of India and the existence of Saleem is actually the history of independence. Saleem is by turns strident, coy, aggressive, rebellious, fatalistic, grave and flippant.

Rushdie is obliged to charge Saleem with superhuman perception, extraordinary powers of thoughts willingly to make the all-knowing accounts of various lives and the life of the country credible as approaching from a single witness. In fact, broken into pieces, the bane of the society of India and politics, rushes through the technique and theme of the novel. Saleem is connected to history by various modes of links, through numerous relationships, both metaphorical and literal. Saleem does not appear to lack an identity, but it is in which several identities press upon Saleem - a reflector of the multiplicity and fragmentation of Indian society and the uncertainty of religious, regional, social, and parochial names below which India suffer. Saleem's existence covers the time from independence to the raising of the emergency, but endearing spots of the past times are also able to be seen through the unlocked sesame of the pierced bed sheet.

The fiction along with the narrative of the Midnight's Children, is the story, which encloses the experience of the three peer group of Saleem's family, living in Srinagar then in Agra, and in Bombay, before the ultimate migration to Karachi. The narrator explains the narrative of three generations to Padma, the girl friend of the narrator. The narrator told the story to Padma by sitting in a pickle factory at night. Saleem flaunts the ability to grasp the attention of the readers. Saleem is skilled with supernatural power of invading other people's minds. He says:

And there are many stories to tell, too many, such an excess of intertwined lives, events, miracles, places, rumours, so dense a commingling of the improbable and the mundane. I have been a swallower of lives; and to know me, just the one of me, you'll have to swallow the lot as well. (Midnight Children 4)

The conception of nation is the idea of a shared community or an "imagined community". The postcolonial societies could create a self-image through the "imagined community" which could find to escape the tyranny of the society of imperialism. Midnight Children written by Salman Rushdie is as the foundational book depicting the Indian nation. In this novel, the birth of the protagonist Saleem coincides interestingly with the official birth of the nation. The protagonist, Saleem Sinai proclaims as the set of its "handcuffed to history" (78). The glue of imagination is the basic ingredient that is needed for the outset of a nation. But to think a nation without any history or criticism cannot be dreamed of. Postcolonial writers could challenge the narrative realism and could show an alternative reality by using magical techniques of realism, there is a traverse between magical realism and post colonialism. The magical realism is used in the postcolonial structure and function and to tackle the postcolonial issues and factors, in the work of Rushdie's Midnight's Children. It is a tool to address political and social issues by turning away from the literary tradition and narration of western style and hence asserting the own sense of reality and identity.

The political adventure of Rushdie, Shame, reveals the trauma of migration which he has been meeting throughout the life. Shame is a about migration. At many places, Rushdie becomes noticeable as the narrator who explains the deplorable stages of migrants state; as he admits in the interview with Ashutosh Varshney. Rushdie says:

It is a novel about the changes of the communities and individuals below the compulsion of migration... and willing to speak about the immigrant community in London especially the immigrant community of South Asia and at that period of time what he wanted to say about it is, " Here's this enormous community of people who are, it seems, invisible—their concerns their lives you know, their fears, and so on, somehow invisible to the white population". (Herwitz 79)

Rushdie has not been worked to shiver off the concept of identity and roots, like all migrants. Roots, as Rushdie says in Shame, are "created to keep the people in place" (Tiwari 134). The roots guide the migrant to be in touch of the nativity and the influence of the pedigrees cannot be destroyed easily. In the novel Shame, Rushdie furnished the assessment of socio-political living in Pakistan. The lifeblood of politics in most of the novels of Rushdie is basically showed by the elements like race, class or nation; and Rushdie does so by improving a universe of originalities - particular characters, including Rushdie, specific cities, precise periods like the moment of partition and decolonization.

Rushdie predicted the characters of Shame as symbolic representations for Pakistan. Each and every character in Shame is illustrated in some way or the other emblematically considering the historical period or history of Pakistan. Rushdie's implementation of mythic mode in Shame combines myth, history, fantasy and politics in a way which it becomes comic and serious at once. The central characters in this novel are based on real political figures, but when the story flourishes it becomes evident that the struggles for power are between the fictional characters Sufiya Zinobia and Omar Shakil, and the link with the narrator's self-reflexiveness. Sufiya is a brain damaged; feeble child of the Hyder's and Omar is the "peripheral hero" of the story, named by the narrator. The character Omar is a doctor and several years elder than Sufiya, but Omar marries Sufiya eventually to gain control over Sufiya's shame that has showed as a deadly and dangerous fury.

Salman uses magical realism in this novel to manifest the personification of shame within Sufiya. This kind of technique puts magical realism of situations into the outset that is otherwise quite normal. The character Sufiya is developed as a sacrificial character in this novel which carries the shame of society upon Sufiya. In this novel, the shame is then changed into a fatal magical power. Sufiya remains unaware to the crimes and mistakes which have committed by herself. Omar's marriage to Sufiya seems to be out of benevolence but is an assertion actually of power and control over herself. Omar makes an effort to achieve to take away the evidence of Sufiya's shame in the same way which has removed it from the own life, by skipping it, but shame wins over Omar in the end. In Shame, throughout the novel the male characters try to dominate over the women characters in their lives.

Shalimar the Clown (2005) is the most engaging book of Rushdie. Rushdie is grappling imaginatively here, for so long a celebrant of postcolonial diversity and hybridity, of cultural merging and fusion, in the wars and fights that have followed. Rushdie provides the complex phenomenon in the following words:

Everywhere was now a part of everywhere else. Russia, America, London, Kashmir. Our lives, our stories, flowed into one another's, were no longer our own, individual, discrete. This unsettled people. There were collisions and explosions. The world was no longer calm. (Stadtler 191)

Salman Rushdie's novel Shalimar the Clown adroitly showed the contemporary history of the unrest in Kashmir and weaves to highlight the interconnection of the two. Both these historical narratives, the structure which emerges from Rushdie's signature stylistic excess is repetition: not of words merely and expressions and phrases but of stages in the plot. This lack of act significantly becomes when the novel is read as a vigilante narrative, in which the leitmotif of revenge, fuelled by dissatisfaction with the redressal, cuts down the splitting line between the political and the personal. Shalimar's personal resentment begins the quest of Max Ophuls, the complying hero who seduces the wife Boonyi. Nevertheless Shalimar's hunt is magnified into the participation with great political project of the mutineers demanding independent Kashmir.

The narrative of Shalimar the Clown blurs the splitting line between the political and the personal continually. The Shalimar combines the hunt for Maximillian Ophuls— the American ambassador came to India in the late 60s, the one who seduced and carried off the wife Boonyi of Shalimar with the greater assignment of the release of Kashmir, to the end then becomes a beginning in panIslamic mutineer groups. Boonyi, abandoned and disillusioned by the ambassador, came back to Kashmir only to be treated as a mritak by the family, and later murdered by Shalimar. The successful climax of Shalimar's hunt is enacted in Los Angeles where Max's assassination outsets Kashmira/India on the stream of Shalimar. Indeed, in Shalimar the Clown, all the character identities perhaps, are fully incorporated within the diasporic identities and so-called hybrid. It is analysed and constructed within the postcolonial discourse, and considering to the coexistence of conflicting traditions and cultures, and in the paradigm of cognitive and conceptual mixture. The conceptual metaphors ruling the elaborate plot are LIFE IS A BATTLE and LIFE IS A JOURNEY. The first thing can be applicable to the lives of India and Max, while the second one concerns the narrative of Shalimar the Clown at different levels. In the novel, Shalimar the Clown structure, function and time passing are organized in a circular structure considering to the Indian conception of time.

To conclude, it can be considered that Salman Rushdie's novels are always strongly connected to criticism, politics and history of Pakistan and India although they are fictions. Rushdie uses various methods and terminologies and treats the facts closely, executes them in his own way. The events and the characters in the books of Rushdie are fictional. The novels of Rushdie are metaphors itself to reframe the politics, history and various critical struggles. The techniques of postmodernism in all the narratives of Rushdie permit to question the political and historical past and its influence on the present realities.

REFERENCES

- Herwitz, D & Ashutosh V. Midnight's Diaspora: Encounters with Salman Rushdie. New Delhi: Penguin Books, 2009.
- Rushdie, S. Midnight Children. New York: Random House, 2006.
- Rushdie, S. Shame. London: Vintage Digital, 2011.
- Stadtler, Florian. 'Terror, globalization and the individual in Salman Rushdie's Shalimar the Clown' in Journal of Postcolonial Writing Vol. 45(2): 191- 199, 2009.
- Slemon, S. Magic Realism as Postcolonial Discourse. Durham & London: Duke UP, 2015.
- Tiwari, J. K. From Routes to Roots: Diaspora in the Novels of Salman Rushdie. The Criterion: An international Journal in English, Vol. II, Issue II, June 2011.